The Feelings Class

At Riverside High School, Thursday afternoons are different. Instead of math or geography, students have a class called "Understanding Feelings." The idea came from the school director, Mrs. Okafor, who noticed that many arguments between students started with small misunderstandings.

In the class, students practice recognizing emotions in themselves and in others. They watch short videos and try to guess how people feel from their faces, their tone of voice and their body language. They also learn simple ways to calm down when they get angry, such as counting slowly or leaving the room for a minute.

At first, some parents were not happy. They thought the school should spend more time on traditional subjects. But after one year, the results surprised everyone. There were fewer fights during breaks, and teachers said group projects ran more smoothly. Students' grades also went up a little, although Mrs. Okafor admits this could have other causes.

Not every student enjoys the class. Daniel, 15, says some of the activities feel a bit silly. Still, he agrees that he now thinks twice before shouting at his younger brother.

Mrs. Okafor believes emotional intelligence works like a muscle: some people are born with more of it, but anyone can make it stronger with practice. Next year, she hopes to offer a similar course for teachers and parents.

1. Mrs. Okafor started the class because ...
 - a. students' grades were getting worse.
 - b. parents asked the school for it.
 - c. small misunderstandings caused arguments.
2. In the class, students learn to ...
 - a. read faces, voices and body language.
 - b. never show other people that they are angry.
 - c. guess what people feel from their words only.
3. In paragraph 3, the word They refers to ...
 - a. teachers.
 - b. some parents.
 - c. students.
4. About the students' grades, we can say that ...
 - a. the class was the only reason they went up.
 - b. they went down during the first year.
 - c. the class may have helped, but no one is sure.
5. The text suggests that Daniel ...
 - a. is the only student who doesn't like the class.
 - b. now behaves better at home.
 - c. is going to stop taking the class.
