Sharing a House at 70

When Margaret Hill's husband died, her big house in Manchester felt very empty. Her children lived in other cities, and she spent most evenings alone in front of the TV. Then her daughter told her about a "homeshare" program.

The idea is simple. Older people who have a spare room rent it to a student for very little money. In exchange, the student helps with household chores and spends some time with them every week.

Margaret's housemate is Ali, a 22-year-old medical student from Egypt. He pays only £150 a month. He takes out the trash, does the grocery shopping and cooks dinner twice a week. On Sundays, they play chess together. "Ali is much better than me," Margaret laughs, "but I'm getting better. It's great exercise for my brain!"

Not every match works. Some students are too noisy, and some older people want too much help. That's why the program checks everyone carefully before they move in.

Margaret is very happy with her decision. "I feel ten years younger," she says. "And I'm never bored now."

 - b. Margaret's husband.
 - c. Margaret's son.
4. Margaret thinks that playing chess ...
 - a. is too difficult for her.
 - b. is good for her mind.
 - c. is the only thing Ali does well.
5. The text suggests that the program ...
 - a. works perfectly for everyone.
 - b. is only for medical students.
 - c. tries to avoid bad matches.
